

‘Welcome to Sydney!’ Tark smiled. ‘It’s just a hop, skip and a jump to the Opera House – over a bit of harbour, of course.’

‘Hey, neat!’ said Tiger. ‘They should put in an adventure playground like this in the park near my house.’

‘You mean Alexander’s house,’ Wanda corrected, rubbing her eyes to be sure she wasn’t imagining all this. ‘You’re on the road, remember? No going back until Project Earthmend succeeds!’

Tiger blinked. ‘OK, so I’m just a little homesick. Don’t you miss your drainpipe, Wanda?’

‘One drainpipe’s much the same as the next,’ Wanda said. ‘If you get too attached to one, you can be sure that some human will destroy it with a backhoe to put in microsprinklers or some such thing!’

Suddenly a pair of pitbull terriers appeared at the park’s edge and spotted Tiger. ‘A cat!’ one of them cried. ‘Let’s rip it to shreds, Martha!’

Seeing them tear across the grass, Tiger’s first instinct was to bolt for the nearest tree, but Tark brought them to a quick stop with a icy beam of light from his toe.

‘Thanks, Tark,’ said Tiger, thumbing a paw at the now-frozen dogs. ‘But you said you’d teach me how to do that myself – now that I’m a Member of the Sacred Few.’

‘I will – in time,’ Tark promised. ‘It’s not as easy as it looks. Watch this.’

Another gesture from the magic toe and the dogs unfroze just from the neck up. They could growl and grit their teeth, but their feet were still fused to the ground.

‘No fair!’ Martha complained. ‘You’re supposed to run, cat, not play tricks.’ She turned to the other dog. ‘Isn’t that right, Herbie?’

Tiger sidled up to them till he was no more than a whisker’s length from the first dog’s yellowed teeth. ‘Better dogs than you have tried to get me,’ he grinned, ‘and ended up specimens for ETs.’

‘Extra-terrestrials,’ Wanda explained to them. ‘Frog-like creatures from the Planet Griffin.’

‘Don’t pull their leg,’ Tark piped in, with slit eyes. ‘And Prince would not approve of you calling us creatures!’

‘We know about Tony!’ Herbie snarled. ‘How you sold him into slavery!’

'How'd you hear about that?' Tiger asked, amazed. 'Is there a doggy grape vine?'

'Wouldn't you like to know, cat!' Martha said.

'In any case, you got it wrong,' said Tiger. 'He's very happy on Planet Griffin! He's young again, and he gets minced steak every night.'

Tark thrust his toe at the dogs again and they were silent. 'You stupid feline!' he cried. 'That's classified information – about our specimens. I'll have to exterminate these two now.'

Tiger was horrified. 'Oh, please, don't kill them. I didn't mean –'

'You can't resist a good gossip, Tiger,' said Tark, as his toe began to throb bright red. 'And now they'll have to pay the price.'

'Ease up,' said Wanda, stepping into the line of fire. 'They're only silly pooches. Can't you just wipe their short term memory, or something?'

Tark considered his options. 'You must be getting soft, Wanda, speaking up for a pair of dogs.'

Wanda stood her ground. 'I thought the idea was to teach the lesser species about Project Earthmend. If you're just going to exterminate them all, then I might as well have stayed in Canberra!

‘OK, OK!’ Tark relented. ‘We’ll...re-educate them.’

With a warming beam from his toe, the dogs came to life from the neck up again.

‘I’ll give you full movement,’ Tark said, ‘if you promise to listen to what we have to say.’

The dogs looked at each other and then shrugged. ‘What have we got to lose?’ they said in unison.

After Tark unfroze them, they were so grateful that they just stayed where they were, licking their paws.

‘Now pay attention,’ Wanda said. ‘You are the first of your species in Sydney to hear this, so we need you to help us spread the word about Project Earthmend.’

The dogs shrugged. ‘No one’s said anything about that in the dog-free. Go on.’

‘The Earth’s in grave danger,’ Tiger said. ‘Haven’t you heard of Global Warming?’

‘Yeah, yeah!’ Martha said. ‘Melting ice-caps, and all that. Islands slipping under water. But our mistress says there’s nothing she can do.’

‘That’s where she’s wrong,’ Tark said. ‘She lets you run free, without a lead, doesn’t she?’

‘Not her fault,’ Herbie said. ‘She wasn’t to know. Herbie here is an escape artist, and once he gets out of our yard, well, I need to look after him – on the roads, and all.’

‘And when you go for these runs,’ Tark continued. ‘Do you...clean up after yourselves?’

‘Of course not,’ Herbie said. ‘That’s up to our human!’

‘Who doesn’t know where you’ve pooped, right?’ Tiger said, going for the jugular.

‘Umm,’ Herbie said. ‘Ummmm.’

‘Exactly,’ said Tiger. ‘And each poo breaks down into methane gas and other unslightly things, contributing to greenhouse gases in the atmosphere.’

‘I’ll...take your word for it,’ Herbie said. ‘But what do you expect us to do – stop pooing?’

‘That could be arranged,’ Tark said, circling his toe menacingly. ‘If you don’t take this seriously.’

Both dogs raised their paws in surrender. ‘We promise!’ they cried. ‘Just tell us what need to be done!’

Tark lowered his toe. 'For starters, before you escape, you must poo in your yard where your human will find it.'

'Fair enough,' Herbie said. 'Then what?'

'She'll then need to worm-farm the poo.'

Even Tiger and Wanda had to look at each other over that one.

'What do worms have to do with it?' Tiger asked, sticking out his tongue with disgust.

'Worms break down the poo into compost,' Tark went on. 'Great stuff for growing shrubs, which in turn absorbs lots of CO₂—before it's lost to the atmosphere.'

'That's no fun,' Herbie growled. 'The whole idea of escaping is so that she won't know where we went!'

It was Wanda's turn to give him a threatening look. 'If we don't do something quickly about Global Warming, there won't be any place to escape to!'

The dogs hesitated then nodded at each other.

'I think I speak for both of us,' Martha said. 'Where do we sign up?'

'Oh, there you are,' said a voice behind them.

It was a young woman, with long blond hair, wearing a track suit and holding two leads. 'Do you want me to get fined again? Let me get these leads on you!'

Then she spotted Tiger, Wanda and Tark and rubbed her eyes.

'You're making friends with a cat?' she said, snapping the leads on the dogs' collars. 'And a blue-tongue...and a funny looking frog? Will wonders never cease!'

'Who's funny looking?' Tark grumbled, his eyes glowing red and his enforcer toe getting very itchy.

The woman staggered back. 'I knew I shouldn't have had so much red wine last night. I'm sure I heard you talk, froggie!'

'The name's Tark,' Tark snapped. 'And I'll have you know my vocabulary's ten times the size of yours. And that's just in English!'

'Uh, right,' the woman said. 'You speak other languages, too. Such as?'

'Russian, Spanish, French... and ones you've never heard of.'

'He's...from out of town,' Wanda nodded, trying to cool things down.

‘And what about you, pussy?’ she asked. ‘Are you from out of town, too?’

‘Too right,’ Tiger replied. ‘My home base is Greenhouse Place—in Canberra. We’re all from Canberra, except for Tark, who is from—’

A harsh glance from Tark made Tiger reconsider mentioning the Planet Griffon.

‘A faraway place,’ he said, leaving it at that.

‘That’s it,’ the woman said. ‘Nothing but green tea for me on Friday nights from now on!’

‘Do you have a boyfriend?’ Tiger said, thinking she was rather cute—for a human. ‘My human Alexander needs someone to look after him while I’m away.’

‘The pack of you have run away—from Canberra? A frog, a blue-tongue and a cute pussy cat! I don’t suppose you’d let me interview you on air?’

‘Interview?’ said Tiger.

‘Just because he can talk doesn’t mean he’s very bright,’ Wanda said, shaking her head at Tiger. ‘You must work at a radio station.’

The woman nodded. ‘I’m the Drive Show host. And I’m sure my listeners would be blown away to hear you. Just the sort of thing to take their mind off peak time traffic!’

‘Project Earthmend isn’t about blowing people away,’ Tiger explained. ‘It’s about saving the Earth.’

‘You’re Greenies, too?’ the woman exclaimed. ‘Then you absolutely must come on!’

Tiger had never worn earphones before. He’d asked Alexander if he could have a go at his iPod more than once, but Alexander always said no.

‘Sorry, mate,’ Alexander had said. ‘Your ears are too small to fit in the buds.’

Remembering that brought Tiger’s homesickness back in a flood. But here they were in the studio, ready to tell everyone in Sydney about Project Earthmend. He’d just have to get on with it.

Tark and Wanda were perched up on Shiela’s (that was her name) desk on either side of the microphone. They were listening to a news story about how The Drought was affecting Queensland, forcing some farmers off the land.

‘Ummm,’ Shiela said, switching on the mic. ‘An all too-familiar story about the effects of Global Warming in our corner of the world.’